

THE FAMILY AND INTEGRAL ECOLOGY

In view of the 2022 (April 27-28-29)

PASS Plenary on

'The Family as a Relational Good: the Challenge of Love'

"If everything is related, then the health of a society's institutions has consequences for the environment and the quality of human life. In this sense, social ecology is necessarily institutional, and gradually extends to the whole of society, from the primary social group, the family, to the wider local, national and international communities. Within each social stratum, and between them, institutions develop to regulate human relationships. Anything which weakens those institutions has negative consequences, such as injustice, violence and loss of freedom." Pope Francis, Laudato Si', 142

The seminar is intended to pave the way for dealing in greater depth and synergistically among the participants (Academics and invited speakers) the theme of the family that will be addressed in the 2022 PASS Plenary (April 27-28-29). The title 'The Family and Integral Ecology' is suggested as a general framework in which to place the theme of the family as a relational good. For this reason it is assumed that the presentations of this seminar should not have the character of papers typical of a scientific conference, but rather have the character of informal speeches that present reflections and suggestions for the 2022 Plenary.

All Academicians are invited to connect to the online seminar and to intervene during the discussion. For this reason, the time of the interventions of the speakers is limited, to give greater weight to the debate on the contents of the 2022 Plenary.

Speakers will have 25 minutes for their presentation, followed by 10 minutes of discussion on their speech. At the end of each session, 35 minutes will be devoted to a general discussion.

All surveys conducted at national and international levels show that the family is at the top of the scale of people's values under every latitude. People claim that the family is the most important thing in their lives. However, when one tries to clarify what is meant by 'family', one enters a field of great uncertainties and contingencies as to the affective, cognitive and symbolic references that the idea and the experience of the family brings with it. In all cases, the challenge is how to think and live the love between family members. It is therefore a question of specifying, understanding and evaluating the different answers to this challenge that emerge today in people's life-worlds. What is the ideal of the family? And what is its reality? In the gap between everyday experience and the desired ideal of a beautiful family lies the challenge of love.

We are all aware that the family is undergoing profound social and cultural transformations that must be understood and valued in their scope and in their consequences. If we consider the deep and rapid changes that the family faces today all over the world, due to the processes of modernization and globalization, it seems necessary to ask ourselves some basic questions that push us to rethink the fundamentals of the family and its reasons for existence in the present society and in the near future: "why the family, and what for?". What are the roots of the family as a natural society and to what extent can culture change them? What reasons support the necessity and the goodness of the family beyond the changes in its social functions?

The plenary intends to answer these questions. It is intended to assess the phenomenology of the family in the contemporary world from the point of view of the social sciences and social policies, in order to offer the Catholic social teaching in-depth elements of knowledge about the current situation and, as far as possible, the near future on a global level.

By referring to the analysis of social facts, the conference will reflect on the family on the horizon of its ontological being and in the perspective of exercising its primary tasks. It is a question of understanding how the family can today humanize the person in a society that is not always friendly with the family. The purpose of the Plenary, preceded by this webinar, is not to draw up a general descriptive report (there are plenty of them, at national and international level), but to focus on the lines of thought and action that can best support the family in the world of tomorrow. On the one hand, we need to clarify the deeper meaning of the family's existence – family ontology, from the social, philosophical and theological viewpoints – and, on the other, to evaluate the practical implications for a better family promotion – social policies and good practices in family services – in the perspective of an integral human ecology. In order to survive, our society needs 'family friendly' policies. It is still a question of implementing article 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights ("Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution. Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State"). To implement these human rights, it seems appropriate to deepen the meaning of family relationships today, taking into account the fact that they are necessary for the humanization of people, but also strongly contingent on the life course of people. The target is to make the family flourish as the primary relational good of society. To say that the family is a relational good means to affirm that the destiny and happiness of people depend on the fact that they consider and share family relationships as their fundamental common good. This common good is created by family members, but it is not particularistic and does not remain closed in the private sphere, because it pours its benefits on the community around with positive externalities that constitute the social capital of large social networks.

Modern social sciences have shown that family changes decide the most profound and significant changes in society. Every new society is the fruit of new family models. In the apostolic exhortation Amoris Laetitia (AL), Pope Francis proposes a realistic approach to the theme of the family. He invites us to see the family not as an abstract ideal, but as a "craft" task (AL 16) which must be approached with tenderness (AL 28), considering that the Word of God "is not shown as a sequence of abstract theses, but as a traveling companion also for families who are in crisis or experiencing some pain, and indicate the destination of the journey" (AL 22). He writes: "anthropological-cultural change, that today influences all aspects of life and requires an analytic and diversified approach, does not permit us to limit ourselves to practices in pastoral ministry and mission that reflect forms and models of the past. We must be informed and impassioned interpreters of the wisdom of faith in a context in which individuals are less well supported than in the past by social structures, and in their emotional and family life. With the clear purpose of remaining faithful to the teaching of Christ, we must therefore look, with the intellect of love and with wise realism, at the reality of the family today in all its complexity, with its lights and its shadows" (AL 32).

Thinking of the family as a relational good and putting this concrete idea into practice in social policies and welfare services, can be a way to build a new 'good society'.

Last but not least, there is the theological subject, since Jesus Christ intended the family to be a sacrament, indeed the only sacrament of social order as such. Being a sacrament means that the people who enact it, i.e. its ministers, are instruments of Christ's grace, which is a participation of his divine nature (2 Pt 1:4). Therefore, the question is how a husband, wife and any children can be made aware of this in order to enact the grace of this sacrament properly in their lives.

Moreover, since the family is considered the cell of social order, how can this grace of the sacrament of marriage be extended to the entire suffering social order, in order to renew it in Jesus Christ?
