Summary of scientific research

The main theme of my research has been the foundation of a new approach in social sciences called "relational sociology". I have developed a general theory (what I call the "relational theory of society") and carried out a number of empirical investigations in order to apply it to a variety of topics such as: family, citizenship, social policies, welfare services, civil society, third sector and social-private spheres, welfare state, intergenerational equity, sociology of genders, religion, cultural change, new media. Based on this theory, new concepts have been developed such as relational goods, relational reflexivity, relational welfare, relational society. My main concern has been to establish a scientific framework in which significant connections can be made between sociology as a science and Catholic social thought, both at the theoretical and empirical levels. Currently my main areas of research concern the sociological emergence of mediating structures of civil society in advanced countries and their interplay as a major cause of redefinition of the modern 'lib-lab complex', and their role in defining an "after (not post)-modern" society. The main goal is to understand how the globalization processes are affecting societal change at the global level, from the point of view of a neo-humanistic social science in a critical position with regard to post/trans-humanism.
